In a conventional optical disk recording system, with the increase of the storage capacity of an optical disk, there are demands for suppressing the cost per bit as well as reducing the access time to desired information. For this, it is desirable that an optical disk has a large number of recording tracks and has a large recording capacity of information. An optical disk substrate 11 is generally formed of transparent plastic. On the substrate 11, a lead-in area 12 is provided for the record of various kinds of information such as the size of the optical disk, the manufacturer's name, the lot number and the disk size. Between the lead-in area 12 and the lead-out area 13, there are provided data recording areas 14. These data recording areas 14 are divided into a plurality of sectors 15, each of which has, as shown in FIG. 4, a pit pattern 16 as a recording signal.
