Libyans celebrate Eid al-Fitr, a holiday marking the end of Ramadan, in the coastal city of Sirte on September 18, 2016. Photo by Amr Al-Sebei/UPI | License Photo Sept. 21 (UPI) -- As fighting continues between Libyan authorities and ISIS in Sirte, some civilians are fleeing to the city's east, using the oil pipeline that runs through the center of town, The National reported. Many local residents have been displaced in Sirte since ISIS took over the city in 2015 and begin to clear out areas under its control. Residents have been creating makeshift roads out of debris, to reach Libya's oil pipeline leading from Sirte to the port city of Kilo Dari. In one instance, a group of local residents linked together construction materials and tires, to create an access route for people displaced in the area. Other residents have also been able to move through tunnels beneath the city, which ISIS fighters have taken control of. Libya's oil and gas exports are the country's main sources of income. Fighting has intensified in recent days between ISIS and Libyan forces loyal to the government of national unity based in Tripoli. National Security forces launched a major offensive earlier in the week. A U.S. official confirmed to The Associated Press that their forces are advising Libyan forces and that the U.S. military is supporting the offensive against ISIS in Sirte. More than 9,000 fighters and militias are fighting ISIS militants in and around Sirte, CNN reported. the fatty acids may be derived from endogenous triglycerides, e.g., natural triglyceride fats and oils, or they may be derived from exogenous triglyceride-containing substances, e.g., low-calorie triglyceride cooking spreads such as those based on vegetable oils
